New Wineskin, Old Wineskin...What's the Difference?

Made from cleaned animal hides (skins -often goat), wineskins were used for carrying wine offerings, for travel and for storing new wine. As the wine inside continued to ferment, the skin would stretch to the point of losing its elasticity. If new wine was stored in an old skin, the skin would often burst from the pressure.

Grapes + Fermentation = Wine

1. Skins of grapes already have yeast growing on them.
2. As grapes are crushed, juice begins fermenting spontaneously.
3. Yeast turns the natural sugars in the grape juice into alcohol and carbon dioxide.
4. Fermentation process often continues after the wine has been stored in the wineskin.
5. The release of the carbon dioxide causes the wineskins to expand.

Newly filled wineskins were often hung and stored in tents from the poles.

Wineskins were sometimes cut and made from patterns for ease of transportation.
